When off the shelf is off the mark.

Every day, with every patient you serve, you use your professional judgment, your expertise, your experience to ensure the health of your patients.

On issues of hormonal imbalance, your judgment is particularly critical because not every patient can take the standard FDA-approved hormones.

Many of your patients may soon face an unnecessary health crisis

The FDA, citing a deeply flawed report that it commissioned, is signaling that it may move to restrict compounded hormones.

This would result in a serious health crisis for millions of patients — for any of your patients who rely on compounded hormone therapies to live their normal lives.

Restricting compounded hormones would limit your ability to treat your patients

Perhaps this story sounds familiar:

“After 15 years of struggling with thyroid disease and menopause, I have finally found medications that work. I tried synthetic thyroid medications before, and none of them gave me the results I get with compounded hormones. My compounded medications have improved every facet of my life. It would be a disservice to all women if these treatments were unavailable.”

And yet, that is precisely what the FDA may be considering — restricting patient access to compounded hormones. Limiting your options in treating your patients.

Be aware. Raise your voice.

We are raising awareness of this critical issue with doctors, with patients, with our representatives in Congress. Because the health and well-being of millions of patients depend on it.
